The Full picture

Today's conversations shed light on a nuanced reality. While the scheme has provided a cleaner source of fuel for many, firewood remains a significant part of village life. Specially during the cold winters reliance on firewood shoots drastically for heating needs. Moreover several residents explained they still used firewood for tasks like boiling water for bathing or other household applications.

This fuel stacking highlights the limitations of a one size fits all approach. While LPG is a clear improvement for cooking it seems a more comprehensive solution might be needed to address all household fuel needs in a way that aligns with local practices.

This understanding adds another layer to the U.Y.'s success in this village, emphasizing the importance of considering local context when designing and implementing such programs.
