Major points of the day:

Today's conversations were a fascinating blend of agriculture and traditional knowledge. Meeting the village fruit farmers was a real treat. They shared their passion for cultivating the land and the challenges and rewards that come with it. Though recent influx in the number of monkeys and langurs captured from urban centres released here wreak a havoc on local farms.

But the day didn't end there! I also had the pleasure of meeting a retired ~~lecturer~~ teacher who has embraced a resourceful way of life. They use their knowledge of herbs and flora to create traditional medicine remedies. It was a glimpse into a unique healing practice that's been passed down through generations.

This focus on local resources for food and medicine resonates with the concept of self-sufficiency.

The knowledge and skills of the farmers and the retired teacher are valuable assets to the village. Perhaps there are ways to document these traditional practices and encourage their continuation.
